Embracing Complexity

We live in complicated times and that’s good. At WPR we thrive on complexity; it’s kind of our thing. We embrace exploration, new perspectives and a diversity of experiences, ideas and expectations. As you’ll see from the enclosed report, 2018 offered us plenty of opportunities to thrive.

As part of our election coverage, we launched a year-long series called “Beyond the Ballot.” WPR reporters interviewed more than 500 people in all corners of the state — asking them about the role of government in their lives. We welcomed Kate Archer Kent as host of “The Morning Show” and toured the state with our “Politics Podcast” team. Our WPR Next project generated its first new show, “BETA.” And, we collaborated with the CBC to host a special cross-border, bi-national call-in show that brought ordinary Canadians and Americans together to discuss trade issues.

Of course, we also carried beautiful music, entertainment and thoughtful conversation on topics useful to your daily routine — from personal health, to gardening, travel, cooking and more. And, we came out to meet you with events in communities big and small.

With two networks, 37 stations and dozens of programs, WPR is a complex organization — but our mission and purpose is quite simple. We’re here to enrich life in Wisconsin — your life — with free and independent content that informs and inspires you and your community.

Thank you for your support,

Mike Crane, Director
A Future for Journalism
As part of WPR’s continuing commitment to training the next generation of journalists with public media’s high standards of ethics and integrity, the station hired three talented reporters as part of our fellowship program: Ximena Conde in Milwaukee, Phoebe Petrovic (pictured right) in Madison and Sarah Whites-Koditschek (left) who is embedded with the Wisconsin Center for Investigative Journalism.

“On Point” with David Folkenflik
NPR’s Media Correspondent and “On Point” Host David Folkenflik (right) stopped by our Madison studios to meet with staff and broadcast the national program in the fall. NPR’s Mara Liasson (pictured on the cover) also visited us in the spring.

Beyond Wisconsin’s Borders
For nearly 20 years Ruthanne Bessman (right) has hosted “Classics By Request” on Saturday mornings. This year, she honored the centennial of Leonard Bernstein’s birth with a special program. During the show she was surprised to receive a request from Marin Alsop, the principal conductor of the Baltimore Symphony, who wrote in from Scotland where she was conducting Bernstein that evening.

Listening to You
WPR’s Audience Services department (right) responded to approximately 31,000 phone calls and almost 5,000 emails in 2018. Your questions about our programs are always welcome. Connect with us at listener@wpr.org or 888-747-7444.

2018 at a Glance
In 2017, WPR launched “WPR Next,” a new content incubator designed to foster talent and produce new programs for the station. After two successful pilots, “BETA” landed on WPR’s weekend schedule in the spring of 2018. According to host and producer Doug Gordon, “BETA” takes an immersive, innovative, playful and provocative approach to exploring arts, culture and technology. “I think there’s a lot more room for playfulness and irreverence on public radio,” says Gordon.

In the fall, “Wisconsin Life” producer Maureen McCollum launched a new series that answers questions listeners post about Wisconsin, its people and its culture. Called “WHYsconsin,” the project has already explored questions like “Who writes those electronic highway sign messages?” “What song best unites Wisconsin’s diverse music fans?,” and “Why is the badger our state animal?”

WPR welcomed new hosts in 2018 as well. Melissa Ingells came on as statewide host of “NPR’s Morning Edition” and Kate Archer Kent moved into full-time hosting of “The Morning Show” on The Ideas Network.

WPR’s commitment to the highest standards of news and cultural content reflects its belief that Wisconsinites thrive with an open exchange of ideas and information. Our news and public affairs teams set ambitious goals during this important state and federal election year.

WPR news launched a year-long project called “Beyond the Ballot” to learn more about how Wisconsinites view the role of government in their lives and the issues they are most concerned about. More than 500 interviews were collected for use on air and online.

Capitol Bureau Chief Shawn Johnson, Capitol Reporter Laurel White and Digital News Editor/Host John K. Wilson, took WPR’s weekly “Politics Podcast” on the road for a series of live shows around the state that combined their first-hand reporting with a dose of humor.

CBC Radio’s “Cross Country Checkup” joined forces with The Ideas Network to produce a live, cross-border call-in show. For two hours, farmers, steelworkers, politicians and entrepreneurs in Canada and the United States phoned in to share hopes and fears about trade talks between the two nations.

WPR is on air, online and in communities across the state. Reporters at our seven bureaus cover the news in depth, from Danielle Kaeding’s reporting on the fire at the Husky Refinery in Superior to ongoing discussion of the Foxconn deal on “Central Time.” And, regional programs like “Route 51” and “Spectrum West” feature Wisconsin artists, authors, innovators and news makers.

Our live events program, WPR Presents, takes our hosts and shows out of the studio to venues throughout Wisconsin. In addition to our “Politics Podcast” tour, “Old Time Radio Drama” performed live in Wausau, Eau Claire and Mineral Point. “To The Best Of Our Knowledge” did a live show in Milwaukee, fans gathered for a traditional Scandinavian meal at Al Johnson’s restaurant in Door County and also for our second Simply Folk Shindig in Wausau.

Finally, WPR hosted free events in Eau Claire, Ashland, Stevens Point and Superior to say “thank you” to listeners. More great events are planned for 2019. Find them all at wpr.org/presents.
